Translating Children’s Literature is an exploration of the many developmental and linguistic issues related to writing and translating for children, an audience that spans a period of enormous intellectual progress and affective change from birth until the age of puberty. This book is aimed at advanced undergraduates, postgraduates, and researchers in Translation and Interpreting Studies. It is divided into three parts: Part I introduces the basic concepts organizing translation and interpreting research, such as the difference between qualitative and quantitative research, between product-oriented and process-oriented studies, and the role of creativity in translation research. Part II provides an overview of applications of corpus linguistics methodologies to translation studies. The different stages and tools involved in corpus compilation and use are outlined, from corpus encoding through corpus analysis. Part III covers the role of translation methods and techniques in analyzing translation data.

Researchers, historians, and philosophers of science have debated the nature of scientific research in education for more than 100 years. Recent enthusiasm for "evidence-based" policy and practice in education—now codified in the federal law that authorizes the bulk of elementary and secondary education programs—has brought a new sense of urgency to understanding the ways in which the basic tenets of science manifest in the study of teaching, learning, and schooling.

Scientific research in education describes the similarities and differences between scientific inquiry in education and scientific inquiry in other fields and disciplines and provides a number of examples to illustrate these ideas. The book also provides guidelines for how the federal government can best support high-quality scientific research in education.
